

To Whom It May Concern

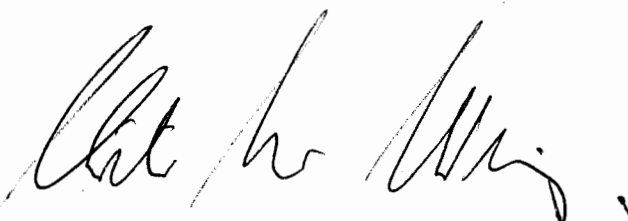

21 June 2007

The Office of the High Representative enjoyed good cooperation with Oxford Research International during their work on a survey in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The OHR fully supported the work which is of crucial relevance at a time when there is a complete lack of data on views and opinions of the population, in particular of those who do not participate in elections.

Oxford Research International's results are unparalleled in quality and substance in Bosnia and Herzegovina and are an invaluable tool for policy-makers, particularly as the country goes through certain crucial phases in nation-building and democratization.

OHR was pleased to be able to endorse the work of Oxford Research International staff in the field and assist the highly-trained staff to obtain valuable data on a scale that has not been carried out in Bosnia and Herzegovina since the war.

Oxford Research International's survey will remain an important tool for policy-makers in the International Community, for the politicians of Bosnia and Herzegovina who are rarely faced with real views from the citizens they serve, and for the citizens themselves, whose opinions are heard here for the first time on this scale. This will be of great value to Bosnia and Herzegovina during the next phase of transition in the International Community and ongoing EU integration.
